Why a Product Page Strategy is Essential

When you shop for products in a brick-and-mortar store, you get the full tactile experience. Unfortunately, this can be difficult to replicate on the digital shelf. You can offer the next best thing, however, with a product page strategy that includes key elements on your product page.

4 Essential Elements of a Product Page Strategy.

Let's examine the four essential parts of a product page, starting from top to bottom.

Age Perfect Rosy Tone

Visibly Helps Color Correct Dark Circles

Rosy Tone Eye Brightener has a unique whipped texture to blur and help visibly color correct dark circles. This formula with Imperial Peony reduces the look of dark circles and visibly brightens skin around the eye area.

Your Beauty Gesture for a Radiant Eye Look

STEP 2

STEP 3

STEP 4
Complement the application with a circular massage on the temples

Building a product page strategy — from top to bottom — could help your brand engage shoppers with product copy, visuals, interactive elements, and testimonials.

1. Product Copy

When writing product copy, it's helpful to think like a customer. What would they want to see on a product page? A great way to gain a customer's perspective is to look up common search queries so you can answer them in your product descriptions. You can also evaluate the competition — especially those with a higher search rank than you — for inspiration.

Specific product description language and a consistent tone can help you tell a story with your copy. You can achieve this by using sensory words that evoke strong feelings, like silky, lush, smooth, and sharp. This will help a customer better envision owning your product.

Product descriptions should include:

- Product features, including technical details;
- Benefits related to using the product;
- Instructions;
- Warranty details; and
- Important product information.

2. Product Visuals

Text-based content is great. It provides customers with details about everything your product offers. But text alone won't help you win on the digital shelf. It should be paired with visuals like product images, videos, and graphics.

Product images are an essential part of a product page. You can show how the product looks on a model or in a setting, like your kitchen or backyard. Customers will appreciate image galleries that they can enlarge and scroll through.

Videos are also helpful to include on your page. You can feature videos explaining your product's features or demonstrating how to use it. Try to include at least one video.

Brand story graphics that tie all your product pages together are essential. When you create enhanced content that contains the brand story, it shows the consumer your commitment to quality products and making products customers love.

3. Interactive Elements

A typical product page includes a product description, a few images, and maybe a video. But the best product page experiences take it a step further with interactive elements.

For example, comparison charts explain how a product compares to similar products or other products in the same product family. Unboxing videos show the excitement of the person opening their package.

All these extra content elements bridge that gap of not physically touching and seeing the product before purchasing.

4. Testimonials

Consumers look to their peers to know what products to buy. If your customers love your product, encourage them to leave ratings and user reviews on your product page. Reading or hearing the thoughts of a person who has already purchased it is the next best thing to being in the store.

Testimonials can include both text-based reviews as well as videos showing the customer unboxing and using the product. The more positive reviews you have, the more comfortable a first-time buyer will feel purchasing your product.
